Fellow Graduates:

As early as four or five years ago the "old type" of school was still fairly common in the West. Twenty or thirty years ago "the old school" was prevalent. The "old type of school" being the school which suppressed originality, the school where the English teacher would accept only the official interpretation of the poem HE was discussing, the school where memorizing was more important than independent thinking, where concern was to do what he was supposed to do, with no questions asked.

The general result was well behaved students. The majority of academic disturbances were seen to originate in the universities where freedom of speech, thought and action were allowed if not encouraged.

Even these disturbances, however, were not on any wide scale because most of the students in the university weren't involved in them. Most students didn't bother to use their new freedoms: they had been too well trained to keep their place. Their general sense of criticism had been channelled against machines rather than man or society. Most of the students therefore stood as bystanders or avoided any type of legal or illegal demonstration.

When these average students left university they fitted nicely into the establishment, as they accepted their lot without question - true to form. They earned their pay, behaved like good little adults. Generally they weren't involved in marches and demonstrations or anything of a "disruptive" nature against the status quo. They weren't committed to any moral issues such as war or racism. They continued their life of acceptance of society as it stood....or fell. They were basically content, or--better--complacent.

However, the educational system began to change somewhere along the line.

The modern high school was beginning to evolve. I feel that we are in the early stages of this evolving process. Schools of today are becoming more like mini-universities as far as freedom of speech, opinion, dress and action are concerned. The "old type" of high school is rapidly being replaced-- perhaps too rapidly.

The school of today is beginning to place a much greater emphasis on thinking than it used to. The result will be and is, more freedom of thought. If there is more thinking on one's own part, at one's leisure, a less patterned or stereotyped thinking results. As with the introduction of freedom of thought at the lower levels-- such as high school--when the young mind is still impressionable, rather than at the higher levels - such as university - one is affecting the potential behaviour of the student in later life. With freedom of thought and speech and therefore freedom of criticism the student naturally turns to criticism of the establishment.

By the time the student graduates to University he will have been accustomed to his freedoms and will find nothing wrong in taking part in a march against war or a demonstration for equal opportunity. And naturally so; the modern school he will have attended will have allowed criticism of the school system and of society. He will have had time to think about injustices in society. Criticism of the status quo will be part of his nature. Because more students will have been familiar with "freedom" in high school more students will take an active part in using their freedoms in university.

When a student graduates from university, into society, he will carry with him his sense of freedoms. He will be more of a potential danger to the vices of the status quo than the average student who resulted from the old type of school.

In today's society we are already beginning to see effects which I feel are partially due to the changes in education in the high school - despite the fact that the ideal I described is really quite a long way off. We are seeing many student riots across the West. We are seeing demonstrations and marches against poverty, war, racism, and political injustice. Look at the Vietnam moratorium deomonstration last week. Look at Sir George Williams University. Look at Czechoslovakia. These demonstrations are student oriented and organized by young people in general.

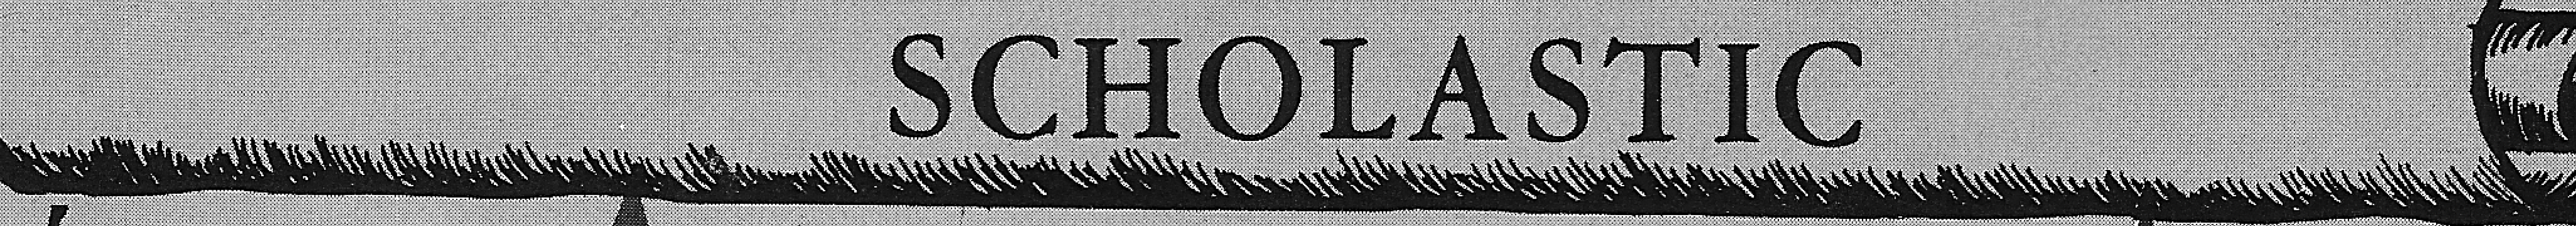

I feel that an impetus to these demonstrations was given by the "modern school". Some of these uprisings you may agree with; others you may not. Whatever you think, they are a result of a change in attitude toward man's basic freedoms in society.

We are in a formative stage at the moment; that is why the high school is such an important part of society today. How schools change with the next eight to nine years will definitely affect the type of society that you and I will know ten or fifteen years from now.

We have to give direction to the "new school" - we, the graduates of 1969, have to give a helping hand by participating in it as much as we can; by finding out more about it; by examining its progress; by raising our voices when we feel something is wrong. This much we owe to our future.
